Lightroom 5 also offers new features such as the ability to apply the same adjustments to a series of images in one go. Another useful feature is the ability to apply a useful new search option to the adjustment layers allowed in the adjustment methods, so you don't always have to combine the adjustment layer with the Layers panel for find out the adjustment settings you want to use. As a result of adding a few extra manual and automatic keypoints, you can make more accurate selection based on the histogram. Although we're not entirely sure how keypoints were added in the first place, it seems the company is making Lightroom 6.0 a reality. Which of course will mean a possible price bracket boost and probably more advances in the area for photographers.
