Writing a French essay Guidelines and practical tips To speak or to produce good .Q: Managing focus in a large Swing application What is the best way to handle the focus of a large Swing application? A: I've written a tutorial on this: It covers, among other things, why FocusManager.requestFocus(JComponent, int, boolean) doesn't work well. In part it's because focus is a window-system dependent concept, and there's not really a good way for a user to tell you "no, I want focus on this, not on that" (or "yeah, that's the thing I'm looking for"). The tutorial shows a method to request that focus should be received on the nearest Ancestor, but it's not a very nice solution. Another interesting problem is when your application is launched by another application; what to do when the event is delivered to the application's top-level JFrame, but the JFrame isn't displayed yet. The tutorial shows how to handle this as well. A: No matter how the application is started, it should not hijack the keyboard focus. This is when one might think about using KeyBindings, but in the case of a Swing application, I wouldn't
