Q: Specialization of the template `std::function` I'm creating a class that should specialize the function `std::function` for each type it can work with. namespace internal { template class Function { /*... */ }; }

It works when I try it on a simple case: namespace external { template void save(T, T const &) { /*... */ } } void create(unsigned int, unsigned int) { internal::Function f; external::Function g; save(f, 1); save(g, 2.123456789); }

How can I create a generic Function template that works with every types T for which I have a save() function? A: Simply mark the base template non-specialized, and override it for specialization purposes: template class Function { // nothing to do }; template class Function { void foo(T*) { /*... / } // nothing else }; template class Function { void foo(const T) { /*... */ } // nothing else }; template void save(T, T const &) { Function::foo(1); }

Live example on Wandbox. A: In your question, you said that you want to work with every type for which you have a save() function. So let's do that: namespace internal { template class Function { void foo(T const &) { std::cout <
