Art Gallery A new report commissioned by the UK Environmental Audit Committee (EAC) and published on June 20, 2019 is entitled Inequity, Indistinctness and Impossibility: Public Service Reforms and Pollution. Our senior researcher, Dr Gary King, and Dr Sylvia Cross have written a chapter in the report on the apportioning and impact of air pollution. The report concludes that "heavy restrictions on polluters, especially including the EU Emissions Trading Scheme, have had a positive impact on environmental quality across Europe. However, the new polluter pays principle has had an uneven distribution of reductions, with regions in southern Europe, Africa and South America most likely to see significant levels of reduction in air pollution. It is in these regions where many of the poorest people live, as well as in developing nations." We have shown that air pollution is unequally distributed across Britain and across the UK, and that the period of restriction on pollution in the 1990s largely benefited the south of England, and that this uneven distribution has improved in recent years, though still lags behind northern England, the Scottish cities and south Wales. In this chapter, we show that, by analysing the emission concentration data from the EU ETS, we can assess the impact of the scheme. We cover air pollution hotspots, with and without the EU ETS, and we can use these hotspots to illustrate why some regions benefit from the ETS, and some do not. When an
